'Digital poverty' in schools where few have laptops

The education of all children has been disrupted in this country but the less advantaged are suffering more acutely than others because of a lack of access to laptops and technology.

At the moment, this means little or no education at all. Many of these kids are in their GCSE or A level years and the impact on their long-term future could be considerable.

How the pandemic broke Britain's schools and stranded a generation

Schools might be open, but many children still aren't learning. A nationwide shortage of laptops – and years of budget cuts – have left schools unable to support the most vulnerable

Laptop allocation for England's schools slashed by 80%

Headteachers are told they will receive far fewer laptops for distance learning than they were first promised

Covid-19: Appeal launched for home learning computers

The insurance market is being asked to help by donating either technology – new or used – or cash. Any cash donated will be used to purchase reconditioned technology.

If you or your firm has redundant technology or can offer new technology turn over to find out how you can help.

Our aim is to help deliver 10,000 computers to help schools level the playing field for all children. Equipment will be delivered to help those most in need.
